

The man in the isolated building was the keeper of one of the most important lighthouses on the coast. That morning, the radio reported the largest shipping disaster of all time.

The night before, the lighthouse keeper had, indeed, forgotten to turn the light on – an unforgivable blunder.

The man behind the bar was in the act of robbing the pub.

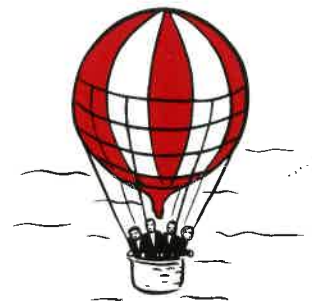

To avoid being identified to the police, he had to kill the only witness.

During a low-flying exercise the (military) pilot had severed the cable carrying a cable car full of passengers.

When he heard of the accident in the news, he realised what had caused the light vibration in his tail section that afternoon.

A hot-air balloon carrying four passengers had gone off course and threatened to smash into a mountain. To gain height, the passengers threw all the ballast, including their clothing, overboard.

It wasn't enough: one of them would have to jump. They drew lots – and the dead man drew the shortest match.
