

The woman had already served a long prison term for murdering her husband. It was a miscarriage of justice, for her husband had actually run off.

Because she had already been punished for his murder, the police saw no reason to detain her any longer.

A convict had bribed an undertaker to help him escape from prison. At the next prison funeral service the convict planned to hide in the coffin with the corpse, and the undertaker would dig open the grave the same night and free him.

When the convict lit a match inside the coffin, he saw that the corpse next to him was that of the undertaker.

The man, a keen angler, had phoned his best friend to brag about the size of the fish he had just caught.

Grossly exaggerating and gesticulating wildly, his arms smashed into the glass sides of the phone box, cutting himself, and he bled to death.

The man had gone hunting for hares in winter. His first shot triggered an avalanche that buried him alive.

His corpse was not found until spring.
